Multiple Choice Answer 1: It is appropriate to tell someone what your professional knowledge tells you about them whenever you want, since you know you are right, and simply want to help.

Response 1: We disagree. Thinking this way is based on arrogance. The human make-up is way to multi layered and deep for anyone to 'know one is right' about another person.

Multiple Choice Answer 2: If the person asks your opinion, you may carefully, step by step tell what you know, always ready to stop, if the person has had enough.

Response 2: We agree. This both allow the other person to maintain his dignity, and allow the counsellor to give potentially valuable suggestions and feed back.

Multiple Choice Answer 3: If you do it with a basic friendliness, and a little sensitivity to prevent others from listening, then you can always tell what you know.

Response 3: We disagree. To be sensitive to preying ears is good, but not enough. The recipient must have the option to refuse being patronised.

No of false answers:    No of true answers:

If you had any false answers, reread the appropriate texts until it makes sense, or email us with a question. Do not just skip it!
